

The best intake and transfer for human beings and the organisation

What comes naturally to a person in terms of both position and work environment requires insight into that person's development. To this end, we go beyond cognition and go back to basics to clarify who the person really is and understand acquired behavioural patterns and competencies. The person's true talent becomes visible. Only then can people flourish using their passion and talent and be successful in their role and provide added value to their employer.

The process

Employees not only utilise their cognitive knowledge and skills in their job, but also their human aspects: their conscious and unconscious motives.

It is from the unconscious that you get to understand:

- The employee's natural competencies.
- Their natural development potential.
- Which competencies are acquired and require energy when the employee is under pressure.

Only then do we get to know the person behind the CV and can we give the employer as well as the candidate the correct advice. In order to be able to map this out, we measure the candidate's competencies based on the unconscious using ACT® Selection.

Result

By looking at employees as whole human beings instead of as resources, they can come into their own in a job that really suits them. Talents will be used and organisations will be more successful.

In short: happy people in successful organisations!
